Young people in developing countries make money in Adventure Box

Adventure Box sees a large and growing interest among its users around the world to create content and make money from their computer games. The Adventure Box gaming platform requires exceptionally low bandwidth and therefore works well even in countries with limited internet capacity.

11-year-old Archibald in Nigeria and 15-year-old Isak in Stockholm are two young people who have already earned more than 100 USD each in creating content and attracting new players to their Adventure Box computer games. Their different conditions in terms of internet capabilities do not prevent them from making money from creating Adventure Box computer games.

"My big interest is computer games," said Archibald in Nigeria. "Adventure Box makes it easy for me to both build and play. I create my own items, weapons, and shields, which I sell to other players inside my game. Making your own money means a lot to me," he added.

"I love playing computer games, and now I can make my own games in Adventure Box," said Isak in Stockholm, who already has created several games. "I'm extra happy with 'The Dark Side' which has over 60,000 gameplays. I like that it is possible to earn money from my gaming hobby, and it is a good thing for me who goes to school," concludes Isak.

Adventure Box is the leading streaming platform for user-created computer games. The company's platform makes web visitors able to play games directly in the browser, without downloading and installing anything. Not being downloaded makes it easier for game creators to invite new players to their games.

"With our latest product release, we have taken another step towards making it easier for game creators around the world to make money from their creativity. That we grow by letting the users themselves create objects for their game worlds, and then selling these to other new users, shows that we are right with our strategy," says Christopher Kingdon, CEO of Adventure Box.
